Lahlum, who chairs the North Dakota Alliance for Renewable Energy, says investors in clean energy are still high on the state - especially when it comes to wind. "Right now, as far as projects in the queue we have almost 11,500 megawatts, and so that certainly demonstrates an ongoing interest in developing wind energy in the state."

The report by Pew Charitable Trusts, "Who's Winning the Clean Energy Race?" notes that clean-energy investments are up 30 percent globally, and that the U.S. is still seen as a ments and strong clean-energy policies. Phyllis Cuttino, who directs the Pew Clean Energy Program, sees fast-growing competition to gather investment cash, whether from the private or public sectors, and wants the report to serve notice that the nation needs to act soon to become the major exporter of clean-energy technologies and products. "As the size of the industry grows, so do the stakes. Countries are adopting policies and programs to attract investment and create manufacturing opportunities," she says.
